Lincoln College

UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD

The building that now houses Lincoln College Library began life as All Saints Church, one of Oxford's historic parish churches with close links to Lincoln College dating back to the College's foundation in 1427. After the medieval church was destroyed by the collapse of its spire in 1700, a magnificent new Classical church was designed by Henry Aldrich, Dean of Christ Church, with contributions from the architect Nicholas Hawksmoor. Opened in 1709, with its distinctive spire completed in 1720, All Saints became one of Oxford's most recognisable landmarks.

As the parish congregation declined during the twentieth century, the church closed in 1971 and was carefully transformed into a library for Lincoln College. Following an archaeological excavation, the building was sensitively adapted to preserve its elegant eighteenth-century character while creating a modern space for study and research.

Much of the original wood carving was incorporated into the new design, and the library was formally opened by Harold Macmillan, Chancellor of the University, on 1 October 1975.

Today, Lincoln College Library remains a place where history and learning come together. As part of Lincoln College's 600th anniversary, this LEGO model celebrates not only the beauty of the building but also the centuries of knowledge, discovery and community it represents, protecting its heritage while helping inspire the next 600 years of Lincoln community.

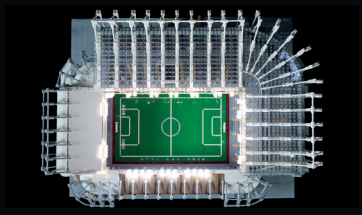

BRICK THIS

Architecture. Engineering. LEGO.

BRICK THIS is a creative modelling company founded by Steve Mayes, specialising in display models and custom kits built entirely from LEGO® bricks.

From central London office developments to oil refineries to rechargeable lorry parks, BRICK THIS brings architectural and engineering projects to life brick by brick. Alongside stunning display models, BRICK THIS also designs custom LEGO kits of products, buildings, and green technology for companies around the world, turning the real-world into collectible LEGO creations!

Steve is an independent LEGO® artist and there are no links between BRICK THIS and the LEGO® Company. This custom kit along with the instructions has been designed and packed entirely by BRICK THIS.
